

MID-JERSEY PEDIATRICS

www.midjerseypeds.com

33 Brunswick Woods Drive
East Brunswick, NJ 08816
(732) 257-4330

25 Kilmer Drive
Building #3, Suite 107
Morganville, NJ 07751
(732) 972-6888

HOW TO INTRODUCE YOUR NEW BABY TO THE DOG

Pet dogs are important family members in many American households, but new parents worry about how the family dog will take to a new baby -especially if the dog has not been exposed to infants before. Following these guidelines will help assure that the relationship between your new baby and your dog will be safe and loving:

Know your dog. Most dogs are curious about infants, especially if they've never seen one before. Dogs probably do not view infants as human beings, but simply as a curiosity; they usually don't show signs of aggression. You should be concerned, however, if the dog has previously shown aggressive tendencies toward infants or adults, or if the dog has shown predatory behavior, such as chasing and killing other animals. If your dog has shown these traits, consult an animal behavior specialist for advice and keep the dog separated from the baby.

Teach your dog basic commands. By the time the baby is born, the dog should sit and lie reliably on command and remain in that position no matter what else is happening. These commands should not be associated with punishment, because they will eventually be used when the dog is near the baby. Instead of punishment, reinforce the behavior you want with positive rewards such as praise or a treat.

Role-play with the dog. Once your dog can consistently remain seated, you can simulate activities you will perform with the baby. With the dog in a sit/stay position, carry a doll wrapped in blankets, rock the doll, and let the dog look at the doll while in the sit/stay position. Reward the dog for staying still. Avoid punishment, but use a firm "No!" when necessary.

Allow the dog to sniff items the baby has touched. Before the baby comes home, present the dog with a blanket or clothing the baby has worn. The dog will become familiar with the baby's scent and be less curious when the baby appears.

Provide a quiet, controlled introduction. Allow the dog to greet you first, without the baby. Then, when the dog has calmed down and the baby is quiet, command the dog to sit and show the baby to the dog. Depending on how exuberant your dog is, you may need to have the dog on a leash at this point. Reward the dog with praise and petting for appropriate behavior. A dog can smell the baby from several feet away; if you're not comfortable about letting the dog sniff the baby closely, it's not necessary at this point.

Supervise at all times. After the introductions are made, the next step is to allow the dog to wander loose. But the dog should never have access to the baby in an unsupervised setting. Although most dogs adapt quickly to the presence of a baby in the household, it's safest to assume that an adverse reaction could occur and to supervise all interactions between the dog and baby.